So Tell Me a Little Bit About Yourself

On nearly every job interview, your interviewer will say this: so tell me a little about yourself.

Now answering this seems like a walk in the park. A piece of cake. An automatic slam dunk. I mean, who knows you better than you?

However, talking about yourself and your life story and your accomplishments and your dreams and your strengths and your skills and—well—how all these things tie in with the job you are interviewing for, is tough. You want to be detailed and specific without —well—being too detailed and too specific. Leaving out information about yourself is just as important as including information about yourself when your time is limited. This is why it is important to sit down, think, and write about yourself in roughly 100 words.

Now you may say something different depending on the job you are interviewing for. However, your core strengths and life story should--for the most part-- remain the same.

So here is your mission. You are on a job interview and your interviewer says, "So tell me a little about yourself." Write your answer in roughly 100 words.
