The exposition of a story is the introduction or beginning of a story. This includes the background information, characters, and setting. Included in the exposition are:

Characters: These are the people or animals in the story. Just like meeting new friends, you get to know who they are, what they're like, and maybe even what they want.

Setting: This is where and when the story happens. It's like the background of a picture. You learn if the story takes place in a big city, a magical forest, or on a spaceship! And you'll find out if it's happening now, in the past, or even in the future.

Problem (sometimes): Sometimes, right at the start, you'll hear about a problem or challenge the characters are going to face. It's like a mystery waiting to be solved or an adventure waiting to happen.

So, when you're reading or writing the exposition of a story, it's like opening the door to a whole new world. You get to meet new friends (characters), explore exciting places (setting), and sometimes even get a hint of the adventure ahead (the problem). It's the beginning of an awesome journey through the story.

You need to write the exposition (beginning) of a creative story. Include the characters etting, and central problem of your tale.
