Schooling should not be confused with education because people can become educated without formal schooling. For example, Abraham Lincoln received little formal schooling, yet became immensely educated by reading a multitude of books. He was known as an avid reader and writer, and it was his self-directed education that transformed him into an intellectual. Bill Gates (co-founder of Microsoft) never completed college, but he is renowned for his entrepreneurship, philanthropy, and more. He is another example of someone who became educated on a variety of topics without actually attending formal schooling for those subjects. Overall, it is evident that schooling and education don't necessarily go hand in hand.
